Property Description

Thailand is on the cusp of a transformative shift in its real estate market.
Proposed amendments to the country’s leasehold property laws aim to make the market more accessible and attractive to foreign investors.
As Finance Minister Pichai Chunhavajira outlined, these revisions are part of a broader economic strategy to revitalize growth amidst domestic challenges, including household debt and diminishing purchasing power.
For investors, these changes signal an opportunity to explore one of Southeast Asia’s most dynamic property markets.
At the heart of the proposed reforms is the extension of leasehold agreements from the current maximum of 30 years to an enticing 99 years.
This move would align Thailand with global standards seen in property markets such as the UK, France, and Cambodia,
